

And No One Takes the Blame

A boy sits still at window's side,
the city burns, no place to hide.
He holds a shard of shattered glass,
once part of what the silence was.

A plane draws shadows overhead,
a breath grows cold, and hearts feel dread.
His gaze is calm, but deep inside,
a voice remains, yet none replied.

